. . . a Utah mountain road. The film stars James Franco and Viggo Mortensen, directed by Danny Boyle, and produced by Darren Aronofsky, Brad Pitt, Dede Gardner, Jeremy Kleiner, and John Orloff. The film had its world premiere at the 2009 Sundance Film Festival on January 22, 2009. The film was released in the United States on October 2, 2009, by Paramount Pictures. Plot A boulder slams into a Utah mountain road, killing the driver of a pickup truck. At the scene of the accident, Aron Ralston, a young man in a survival gear, crawls to the truck's passenger side window and begins pulling the driver, a stranger, free. Despite calls to 911 from bystanders, he himself is unable to move the victim out of the vehicle. Two days later, he locates a station wagon carrying an electric winch. Ralston uses the winch to pull the victim free and begins the process of extricating him from the wreckage. Initially, his arm is severed and trapped by the truck's steering wheel. Ralston uses a hammer to crack the wheel free, freeing his arm. The latter is now unharmed. Later, an EMT cuts off the victim's left forearm, saving the victim's life. As Ralston builds a shelter with a bed and other supplies, he realizes that he must now leave the victim where he is. Ralston improvises a tourniquet from his hunting knife, binds the severed arm, and attempts to climb out of the canyon. On the way up, a falling rock kills Ralston. The film ends with an entry of his last words: "I'm gonna climb out, I'm gonna build a shelter, I'm gonna call somebody, and I'm gonna live." In 2010, the documentary The Real 127 Hours featured Ralston and several other climbers recounting their experiences and reliving scenes from the film. Cast James Franco as Aron Ralston Viggo Mortensen as Danny Padilla Ian McShane as Doc Bruce McGill as Henry JT Sorensen as Jeff James Parks as Scott Sorenson Clark Middleton as Ty Sorenson Production In 2006, screenwriter Josh Olson, who was in a relationship with Boyle at the time, began work on a screenplay inspired by the true story of Aron Ralston's 82157476af
